Du åbnede dine øjne og vågnede som altid. Men du åbnede dine øjne i det forkerte hus. Et hus uden døre, uden nødudgange. Tilbageholdent rørte du ved husets vægge, og væggene føltes bløde. Væggene føltes bløde som hud, væggene føltes skarpe og væggene føltes tynde, og væggene viste sig at være huden på dit eget lille, ømme bryst.

Miriam Kongstads soloudstilling The Onset Of Fever kan samlet set anskues som en installatorisk refleksjon over smerte. Med udgangspunkt i den menneskelige krop, ensomhed, kronisk sygdom og intimitet, er det særligt kontrasterne og modpolerne i smerten der stilles skarpt på. Via koblinger mellem skulptur, lyd og et større nyudviklet vægværk, skabes et totalunivers der spiller op imod den spænding, subtile intimitet og omsorg for selvet, der også er at finde i smerten.

Huset som et arkitektonisk symbol og metafor for menneskekroppen spiller en central rolle i udstillingen; kroppen som en uundgåelig bolig, en vært for både vitalitet og brutalitet, klaustrofobi og transcendens. De arkitektoniske referencer skinner blandt andet igennem i værkernes formelle struktur, som sidestiller et hus i lige dele konstruktion og forfald med menneskekroppens simultane ældning og regenerering. Herudover foretages også et større arkitektonisk indgreb, i form af lydværket Homeostasis, der indhyller udstillingsrummet i et pulslygnende loop, som befandt vi os i det indre af en krop.

Udstillingens protagonist er et ufødt væsen, der vogter udstillingen som en vagthund. Væsenet, der kærtegner sine kønsdele, er baseret på forskning, der peger mod, at fostre masturberer i moderens livmoder. Forskning der hovedsageligt er blevet anvendt i anti-abortkampagner, med argumentet om, at kan et foster føle nydelse kan det også føle smerte. I vores kollektive bevidsthed synes smerte og nydelse at være tæt sammenvævet som et vitalt grundvilkår for den menneskelige eksistens - allerede før fødslen.

ENG:

You opened your eyes and woke up as usual. But you opened your eyes in the wrong house. A house without doors, without emergency exits. Reluctantly, you touched the walls of the house, and the walls felt soft. The walls felt soft as skin, the walls felt sharp and the walls felt thin, and the walls turned out to be the skin of your very own tiny, tender breast.

Miriam Kongstad's solo exhibition The Onset Of Fever can be approached as an installational reflection on pain. Based on the human body, loneliness, chronic illnesses and intimacy, especially the paradoxes and contrasts within pain are explored. Through sculpture, sound and a newly developed large-scale wall piece, a universe of tension, subtle intimacy and care for the self is created, qualities which also belong to the realm of pain.

The house as an architectural symbol and metaphor for the human body plays a central role in the exhibition; the body as an inescapable abode, a host for both vitality and brutality, claustrophobia and transcendence. The architectural references shine through in the formal structure of the works, juxtaposing the resemblance of a house in both construction and decay, and the human body in simultaneous ageing and regeneration. The sound piece Homeostasis and its fluctuating, pulse-like loop, establishes a larger architectural intervention, by enclosing the exhibition space, as if we had entered the interior of a body.

The protagonist of the exhibition, depicts an unborn creature, guarding the exhibition like a watchdog. The creature, which caresses its own genitals, is based on scientific research seemingly proving that foetuses masturbate in the womb of the mother. Most frequently this research has been used for anti-abortion campaigns, arguing for the ability of a foetus feeling pleasure as inseparable from the ability to feel pain. In our collective consciousness pain and pleasure appear to be inevitably interwoven as vital conditions for human life - even before birth.
